Not illustrated. 1900 edition. Excerpt: ... adenoma of the thyroid, or parenchymatous goiter. At other times the preexisting tubules increase both in length and breadth at the same time as the amount of colloid greatly increases. This is known as colloid goiter. The colloid material is secreted by the cells, which may also change directly into colloid material; in that case there appear in the cells small, glistening drops of colloid substance which gradually coalesce to form larger masses, crowding the nucleus and obscuring the cell outline. When such changes occur over a considerable part of an acinus, the colloid material lies in direct contact with the connective tissue. Desquamated epithelial cells, or fragments of such, are often found in the colloid material. If the epithelial cells do not degenerate, the constantly increasing mass of colloid flattens the cells more and more. The colloid contents of the lymph-vessels are also often much increased. The great dilatation of adjacent follicles may lead to their confluence with lymph-vessels, whereby larger cystic spaces filled with colloid material are produced (cystic goiter). Hemorrhages may render the contents rusty red or brownish in color, and mixed with blood pigment (hemorrhagic goiter). The surrounding stroma often proliferates, sometimes in the form of papillary ingrowths into the follicular spaces, the epithelium of which is lifted up and carried inward. Among the frequent degenerative changes in the fibrous tissue of a goiter may be mentioned hyaline changes, which are among the more common. Broad, glistening, homogeneous bands without nuclei are then formed between the gland spaces; the hyaline changes frequently occur in an extensive degree in the walls of the blood-vessels, whose lumen often appears greatly...
