

The Modern Angler; Comprising Angling in All Its Branches In Two Parts, Vol. 1 of 2 (Classic Reprint)

Being strongly urged by some of my friends to publish a treatise on this most innocent and recreative amusement, I have complied with their request, and now lay before the lovers of the rod and line more than thirty years experience, in as concise and lucid a manner as my humble abilities will allow. I should have hesitated to follow the different writers on this subject, had I not been confident there was room for improvement a few of which, I believe, I have been able to supply. You will find that the flies and baits, and the different methods of angling that I shall in the course of this work enumerate, will take salmon, trout, grey ling, pike, or other fish, in any river in the united kingdoms of Great Britain and I reland, if care and strict attention be paid to the precepts I shall put forth. The system I have laid down in the course of this work for making the different flies, will supersede any thing of the sort that I have seen in any previous publication. There is one particular point I wish to draw attention to, viz., the method I take to strip the feather with which I make the winged fly, for by that means the wings will be parted when the fly is made, without the trouble of whipping the silk across two or three times, which I have seen recommended, and will be a much neater fly, and swim a great deal lighter.
