

Although the elderly comprise only 12% of the general population, they consume 25% of all prescribed medication. For those taking psychotropic medication, the risks of interactions are increased. To complicate medication management, many psychotropic drugs are associated with side effects that become less tolerable with age. Consequently, frequent drug monitoring is essential to proper clinical care of the geriatric patient. This volume aims to help clinicians determine risk-benefit ratios for psychotropic drug use and make choices about the appropriateness of alternative treatment approaches.
